Obviously the content on my site really bothers you.

I linked to your site because a number of the readers to my site provided some positive comments about your publication, and the article you did about me and my photography.

I have removed your email address from my files so as to not bother you with content you do not wish to receive. That was my legal obligation.

As to the link, the content of this email will be posted along with the link to your website. I will however remove the illustration from the link, since it is your copyrighted publication. However you cannot prevent me from linking to your site as long as I am not using copyrighted material. You also cannot prevent me from disclosing any and all communications between us to my readers, some of which are your active advertisers.

My original objective for linking to your site was simply to provide you with additional exposure of your magazine. However, this entire exchange has provoked in me toward the opposite objective.

Have a good day,

Leo Touchet

Exactly when can I expect to no longer see our publication linked to your site?

Your name was automatically added to my email list when you sent me an email regarding the article your magazine recently did on me. In return, I added a link to the 337post.com website for your publication. If you do not wish to receive my publication, then I will also remove the link to yours as well as remove your email address.
